"Robbins is the nurse who is leaving you?"

"Robbins is! But she is more—she is a trensure. I do not think I ever valued Robbins as she deserved to until she gave me notice. She has been with the child ever since my wife died—three years—and I have never had a moment's trouble or anxiety, and the responsibility of being a widower with a helpless haby to take care of is simply keeping me awake at night. The interviews, too, are rapidly Eiving me gray hairs. I betray my deplorable ignorance at every question. There ought to be a book published on the subject—Hints to widowers engaging a nurse. The wretches see my nervousness and attempt to bully me when I say they won't do. One girl does seem all right, however; she came from the registry office this morning."

She laughed.
"And you didn't know it was me you were coming to see?"

"I hadn't an idea of it." he explained.
After all these years—and I didn't even know you were in England. I came—it sounds very silly—I came about a sounds very silly—I came about a nurse's character."

"A nurse? You—you are married, then?" said Mrs. Hillery.
"I mayled four years ago. I have been a widower for three. I've one child, a girl."

There was a little pause between them. He fingered hiß gloves, and his hostess played with a paper knife.
"Your husband is well, I trust?" asked Mr. Vansittart, at last, with an effort. She gave a palpable start, They had once been so much to each other, and now he did not even know that she was a widow.

a widow. "I lost him." she murmured, "soon after our marriage."
"I-I ber your pardon. Poor Frank! We used to be very good friends before—at one time, I should say. You have a child?"
"Bertie—a fine little fellow he is, You must see him before you leave, Of course you will stay to dunch."
"I shall be very pleased," said Vansittart. "How strange it is to see you again, Madre, You have forgiven my hasty words when we parted, I hope."
"I am afraid I deserved them," she confessed humbly, "but we were both very young and very hot-headed. I am glad no harm was done; you were happy in your married life?"
"Y-e-s," he said. "Oh, yes, I was happy. Amil you?"
"Frank was very kind and indulgent," she murmured. "Oh, yes, I don't suppose I merit only plty. But tell me-I did not understand—you have really come about a servant's character? Who is she"
"She is, I think, a 'Sarah Brown."

come about a servant's character? Who is she?

"She is, I think, a 'Sarah Brown'." He consulted his letter case. "Yes, her name is Sarah Brown! I want her for the child, it she is capable. Please recommend her if you can, another disappointment will kill me."

"You want her so badly."

"I want some one very badly—Sarah Brown or otherwise. You can form no iden of what it is to be a father, Mrs. Hillary—Madge. The responsibility of engaging a nurse is rapidly shortening my iffe."

"Poor fellow!" said Mrs. Hillary, with compassion. "Well. I should think Brown would sail you very well, indeed. She is guite qualified, and, in fact, I'm rather sorry to part with her." "Why did you part with her." "why did you part with her." he inquired.

"You see, I'm becoming au fait at the business. What was the cause of quite, quite candid, I'm not sure the temper wasn't on my own side. Anyhow, I can give her a good character, to you a anyone else."

He heaved a great sigh & relief.

"Then-that's settled. How glad I am it's over. You can't think how I dreaded this interview with an unknown 'Mrs. Hillary,' but somehow with you it wasn't difficult it all, even the domestic part of it. You were always reliable, Madya—always with one exception, that is to say. That is a likeness of you on the mantel-piece. May I look?"

He took it down and scrutinized it attentively.

May I look?

He took it down and scrutinized it attentively.

"Good," he said, "distinctly good, They've caught your expression. When was it done? Recently? Indeed, And it might he the girl I took down to support at the Richmonds' half seven years ago." He put the frame back and turned his gaze to the original. "So might you," he added, "Im a middle niged man and you are just the same. Do you remember that night? You treated me very badly, Madge."

"You were very ungenerous," you mean," she retorted, gently.
